Make Bathtime Easy For Baby and Mom

By HERMAN N. BUNDESEN Bathing a baby is often a real chore for a new mother. Sometimes, it presents a great danger to the infant. It needn't be, either, if you just remember a few fundamentals.

For one thing, make sure the water isn't too hot for baby's delicate skin. Best and simplest method of testing the water's rule. temperature is to dip your elbow into it. The water is safe if it feels neither hot nor cold.

Always support the back and neck of a young baby when he is not lying flat. Remember, too. that an infant covered with soapsuds, is pretty slippery. You've got to grasp him firmly so he won't wriggle out of your hands. The bathinet, tub or whatever you use to bathe him should be on a firm support. The dressing table should be against the wall.

Using Talc

Talcum powder is fine for preventing chafing. However, I caution against using any powder containing stearate of zinc. Be careful, also, not to let the baby breathe in the powder while you riboflavin or vitamin B-2.

are talcuming him. When powdering his chest and neck, place your hand between the baby's face and the powder can.

Baby oil can be used instead of talcum if you wish. Many mothers prefer oil since it protects a baby's skin from the urine and stool. In warm weather, however, talcum is preferred as a

If you use oil, place a few drops on your hand or on a small piece of cotton. Then pat it gently into the folds and creases of the infant's skin. Be sure to wipe off any excess oil.

You've got to wipe away excess powder, too, or it may cake and irritate his skin. The more often you bathe baby the easier and safer it will become for both of you.

Association Acquires

Additional Land
